Synopsis

"Powerful...Every page is saturated with the 1930s milieu as the sisters navigate the adversities of their reality on a sea rough with the unrealistic expectations of well-intended idealists both religious and secular. As if to highlight those expectations, Taylor periodically interrupts her third-person narrative with Greek chorus-type commentary from the Scranton-based Isabelle Lumley Bible Class, including excerpts from a 1929 sex manual for women. The overall result is a thought-provoking book club discussion cornucopia."--Booklist, Starred review

"Set in the 1930s, Taylor’s suspenseful and intricate follow-up to Sing in the Morning, Cry at Night tells the story of sisters Violet and Lily Morgan...Taylor delivers startling plot twists and incisive commentary on the social unrest of a coal-mining town during the Great Depression. Covering a six-year span, the novel reveals the consequences of arduous labor and widespread sterilizations that came with the eugenics movement. Among the prostitutes, mobsters, and miners is a web of interconnected lives that come together for a breathtaking ending in Taylor’s fine sequel."--Publishers Weekly

"Barbara J. Taylor has created another suspenseful page-turner... revealing shocking details of enlightened thinking in the 1930s against the backdrop of political corruption, unions, rampant prostitution, coal mine strikes, and judgmental Christians. But it’s Taylor’s finely honed characters and plot twists that make All Waiting Is Long... an unforgettable novel."-- BookMark on WPSU

"In this richly populated community, old ties are either torn or tightened, and the characters left behind when the sisters went off are nicely fleshed out...Ms. Taylor writes with total mastery of her craft. Her similes and metaphors are born of a highly developed abstractive sensitivity, and her dialogues are unerringly true to their respective speakers."--BookPleasures

Against the backdrop of the sweeping eugenics movement and rogue coal mine strikes, the Morgan sisters must choose between duty and desire. Either way, they risk losing their marriages and each other. The novel picks up sixteen years after the close of Barbara J. Customer Reviews

Barbara Taylor’s “All Waiting is Long” is a reminder that the good old days were not always good for everyone. Set in Scranton, Pennsylvania in 1930, the novel highlights the attitude toward girls and women, the exploitation of and the hardship experienced by those working in the coalmines, and the prejudice based on religion or nationality. In spite of those themes, this story is also one of love, self-sacrifice, and the strength of family. Sixteen-year old Lily Morgan is unmarried and the family way. Along with her older sister Violet, she travels to Philadelphia where she will await the birth of her child at the Good Shepherd Infant Asylum located in a former convent and staffed by nuns. Self-centered, Lily insists Violet tell no one about the pregnancy and birth. This restriction includes not telling Stanley Adamski, a young man Violet plans to marry after he completes law school. As an eight-year old boy working in the coalmines and as the result of an industrial accident,
Stanley lost a hand. His life depicts the conditions in coalmines during the period. Unselfish, always thinking of others and because of her mother’s nervous episodes, Violet had given up a scholarship to Bloomsburg Teacher’s College. Violet felt obliged to stay because of her self-sacrificing attitude and her subsequent actions lead to a fateful decision. As moves through the story toward its conclusion, the decision will have an impact on both sisters’ lives and on the lives of others. The attitudes and prejudices detailed in this novel will surprise younger readers. Couples sometimes abandoned children born with physical challenges; single mothers gave birth secretly and did not keep the child.
